Want a breed with the looks of a leopard and the demeanor of a domestic cat? Look no further than the Bengal, a breed that was developed by crossing small Asian Leopard Cats with domestic cats. Bengals have stunning coats that come in many striking patterns: rosettes, spots or even marbled, where one or more colors swirl into his coat's background color.

Leopards have the largest distribution of any wild cat, occurring widely in Africa as well as eastern and southern Asia, although populations have shown a declining trend and are fragmented outside of sub-Saharan Africa. Longevity: In the wild, leopards live for years and they may reach 20 years in captivity. Download Biology Facts Prey: Amur leopards hunt a very wide variety of animals including roe deer, sika deer, badgers and hares.

The leopard cat is the most widely distributed Asian small wild cat. Its range extends from the Amur region in the Russian Far East over the Korean Peninsula, China, Indochina, the Indian Subcontinent to northern Pakistan. The leopard is a Near Threatened big cat species that inhabits Africa and Asia. They are considered Critically Endangered in Asia. Decreases in wild leopard population are the result of habitat loss and illegal wildlife trade.

The leopard or panther is a large, graceful cat with a long, lithe build. Its coat is pale brown to yellowish-brown with dark brown spots in rosettes. Some individuals are very dark brown, almost black, effectively masking their spots and producing the famous black panther.
